Local History Digitization Initiative at KPL

Digitization Specialist

RESEARCHERS SAY, “You can’t cite it if you can’t see it.” Like most public institutions of its kind, Kalamazoo Public Library has a wealth of knowledge locked away in its holdings. Tens of thousands of books, manuscripts, maps, photographs, and documents contain valuable information, whether for seasoned researchers or for interested folks like you and me. But accessing some of those materials may be difficult or even impossible because of their value and/or fragile nature. While the majority of the library’s holdings are cataloged, those records tell only part of the story. Oft times there is useful information hidden away that escapes even the sharpest of catalogers. A historic image of a busy city street scene contains many interesting clues... but look closely. Did you notice the advertisement on the front of that passing streetcar?

Consistent with the library’s goals of preservation and equitable access, digitization removes physical barriers to the discovery and use of rare and fragile materials while protecting precious originals from damage. Careful consideration is given to such concerns as digital storage and retrieval, sustainable digital file formats, useful metadata, and more.

To that end, KPL has begun an exciting project of digitizing many of its rare holdings. Thanks to a generous bequest, the library has established a state-of-the-art digitization lab where library staff are undertaking the massive task of capturing high-resolution images of archival materials. Those items may then be examined in detail while the originals remain locked away for safekeeping.

In addition to the library’s holdings, staff will be working closely with the general public and other local institutions to digitize materials of historical interest in their collections, like grandma’s old snapshot of the steam engine as it chugged past the family farm on that long-abandoned railroad line. A preview of this effort may be seen in the library’s online collection of Civic Theatre programs at thecivic.kalamazoohistory.org, but that’s just the beginning. Stay tuned for more collaborative projects. ▲

Note from the Director

Ryan Wieber
KPL Director

The library anticipates a reopening of all locations by early June, with curbside service still an option for patrons who prefer to have items delivered outside. We will still enforce social distancing and mask requirements and adhere to the current MDHHS maximum 50% occupancy level. More good news: Magazines and newspapers will be available, and circulating or in-library technology items such as iPads, Chromebooks, and video games will also be readied for use. Meeting rooms and program spaces remain closed for the immediate future, and children's toys will continue to be stowed away. Library staff are pleased to reopen the library and welcome you into our community's beautiful spaces by assisting you with reader's advisory, reference help, computer and technology assistance, and so much more!

A year of library service during the pandemic has by necessity produced a new way to deliver story times, author visits, and book discussion groups. All doable – and sometimes more convenient and engaging than in person – yet we all yearn for a return to events at the library and sharing a love for books and reading in a common space. Virtual events will no doubt remain a part of the library's future, as necessity has transformed into expectation and follows the new habits of library users everywhere. As conditions continue to improve with more vaccinated and fewer becoming ill, the library's program rooms will eventually be used for conversations, lectures, and story times – rather than for storage of excess furniture, boxes of PPE, and oversized bins of quarantined books.

As would be expected, the library's traditional activity measurements such as circulation statistics, patron visits, and program participation have been low due to closed doors, lack of access, and concern over the virus. Yet library staff continue valiantly behind the scenes keeping library facilities safe for patrons and staff, cataloging new materials for shelves, delivering books at curbside, and trying new ways to provide some level of access to books, eLearning, DVDs, hotspots, and programming. Thank you for your patience during the past year as we have adjusted, endured, experimented, learned, achieved, and occasionally failed. We are so looking forward to seeing you again and providing meaningful impact through the library's services, collections, and programs! ▲
